

PALLET RACKING AUDITS

AUDITS: Pallet racking frames and beams can suffer impact damage from forklifts. Living on our shaky isles means earthquakes are relatively common. To ensure the ongoing safety of your staff and your stock, we highly recommend a programme of maintenance and safety audits.

Perhaps you need to change beam levels to accommodate a change in inventory or there has been an increase in the weights of the products you are storing. Our audit includes an annual physical inspection, which may result in a recommendation for maintenance. We'll check for any damage, supply any new components needed and quickly manage the installation to minimise your downtime.

This service provides invaluable peace of mind in areas of high seismic activity or following an impact from your material handling equipment.

When should you get a safety audit?

Regular inspections should be carried out every 12 months. However, if there's an incident involving your existing racking, you'll need to consider its occupational safety and insurance implications.

If there's been a recent, significant earthquake in your region, first, make sure your team is safe. Then, if you can do it safely, make sure there are no unstable stock items at height. We also recommend a professional safety audit, to ensure your racking is still structurally sound following seismic activity.

What to expect during a safety audit?

Our team will do a visual inspection to identify any points of damage. They'll check for correct loadings, and make sure your safety signs are in place and visible. You'll then get a detailed written report highlighting any areas of damage and an estimate for any repairs needed.

This is a good time to look at proactive ways to optimise the safety and efficiency of your storage systems.

Is there any downtime?

Our crew will work around your operations to eliminate downtime. We also offer de-installation, relocation and storage options if you're looking at moving premises temporarily or permanently.
